The following letter was addressed by a and the Supreme Cours at Jackson. member of Congress to his wife, during the administration of President John Adams. It describes a dinner at the Presiden'ts House, and gives a pleasing illustration of the domestic economy of that period:

PHILADELPHIA, June 9th, 1797. My Dear Maria-I wrote you a few lines vesterday, and promised you a long letter by this day's mail. The grounds of my promise were, that having dined at the President's, I certainly could not lack for materials to compose a very handsome letter indeed, and one of no small importance. Our House were so when attacked by robbers or assassins," that coive prompt attention. we did not adjourn until after 4 o'clock (the hour at which we were to dine.) We therefore, went straight from the House of Representatives to the Presidents and were introduced by name to the President, who shook us by the hand, and then he introduced us to Mrs. Adams, who rose up to receive our bow. We then sat down, and the waiter handed round a glass of punch, which, permit me to say, was very agreeable, after having sat for five long hours, hearing a very dry debate on a very clear subject. In a few minutes dinner was announced, and one of the gentlemen handed Mrs. Adams into the dining room. The President followed, and the company followed him. Mrs. Adams sat at the head of the table, and the Secretary at the foot, and the President sat at one side near the middle. The company took their seats alto- tion Supplies in general. gether promiseuously, except that the Chaplain of our House, who said grace, sat at Mrs. Adams's right hand. Grace having been said before we took our seats, we had nothing to do but to attend to our business. But here it is necessary to give a description of the bill of fare, and the arrangement of the board; but I am very much afraid that I shall not only be inaccurate, but that I shall fail in giving a brilliant and interesting description of this important subject. As I wish, however, to be PETER B. COOK. as good as my word, I shall attempt it. - There were about 20 persons at table. The utensils were only common blue china plates, glass tumblers, and wine-glasses. The table was decorated or garnished with glass stands, five in number. On the two extremes were dishes of only common lettuce or salad; next to these, towards the centre, at each end, was a piece of pastry work, resembling a large cake baked in a tin pan, and turned upside down and decorated with rose buds just opening. In the centre there was a large cake of the same forin, but it was incrustated on the outside with a fine white frosted surface, spangled radishes, &c. The dishes were nine or ten in number, viz, at the head—a piece of beef a la mode; at the foot, a large roast pig, then, alternately, fish, a warranted as usual. leg of mutton, tongue, boiled fowls, ham, corned beef, a dish of small birds, chicken pie, and perhaps two dishes more; I cannot be certain. All these, however, were preceded by soup, not calf's-head, but common. The vegetables were peas, salad, potatoes-new ones but very small, cranberry sauce.
